and lovable, no art appeals to one's sense of the reality and truth of nature guite as much as the art of Rembrandt, Hals, Van Dyck, Van der Helst and others of that school.

Mr. Caffin as a writer has put out many interesting books, lucid in style and full of siterary charm. His published works comprise The Study of Dutch Painting, American Masters of Fainting, American Masters of Fainting, American Masters of Fainting, American Masters of Sculpture, How to Study Pictures, etc. Recent magazine articles are The Art of Ettore Tito, The Art of Frank W. Bender, the Art of Harold Speed and Some New American Painters in Paris.

About four years ago Mr. Caffin was secured to give the Trowbridge course of five lectures on art at Yale univernity, a course usually divided among different lecturers. He filled the large gallery during every lecture so that many had to stand. He is lecturing this winter in Philadelphia and other large cities, and Norwich is to be congratulated upon its coming splendid opportunity.

THE COMMONPLACE.

I thank God for the commonshire— The Joys that garment every day— The unremembered, unseen things That keep the common way.

The routine sun that all the years Has kept his one unchanging pisce, Unnurmuring through cloud and mist, A amile upon his face.

Man's life is like a little road. That runs beside a cabin door, Feeling its way among the flowers. That bloom forevermore.

And hedged about by common things. That change not as the years ron by, The ancient landmarks lead him on Toward the homing sky, The heavenly glory does not hide.

Far off in some sequestered place.

The morning's opening door reveals.

God in the dalay's face.

I gathered the vine.
The gold love-vine,
To send to an esc.
Bweetheart of mine.

I went over the fields, All wet with daw: To the meadow green, Where the love-vine grew.

There came a memory Of olden time. To me, as I gathered The golden vine.

Of the dags far gone, Those days of fay When we were care free Girl and boy.

And gathered the vine,
The gold love-vine,
When he was a new
